REPORT FROM INDIA:
WOMEN FOR WOMEN
Dear friends,

It’s been a busy nine months since I first grasped the reins as Chair, and except for a few bumps in the road, I’ve been overwhelmed by how hard everyone has worked to help us tackle the life critical effects of water poverty – a very big thank you to you all.

With a tough funding climate, I’ve been striving to make us as impactful and relevant as possible. So when I was lucky enough to visit some of our projects for the first time recently, I couldn’t have been more impressed by how our work has changed people’s lives. I met women, now freed of the burdens of fetching water, who had time to join other women to create cooperatives. This gave them new opportunities to sell produce or milk together, where they couldn’t independently. I was truly humbled by meeting people with such amazing spirit and resilience for survival.

How good the chai tasted when made straight from the milked cow at every village – I loved it!

We will work hard in the UK over the coming months to align who we say we are with what we do. The work has already begun with the launch of our new website (if you haven’t had a chance to see it yet, we’re at: www.wellsforindia.org), which along with a stronger online presence is starting to attract a younger and broader audience of support. In India, we’re pushing ahead to create an infrastructure that will allow us to receive the many generous offers of support from Indian donors, within India.

So even though I’m still learning, I’m proud to be at the helm for Wells for India’s 30th birthday year and hope you can join me for a slice of cake at our party on 6th October.

How can you help fight water poverty?

Warriors for Wells

We’re inspired by Kunal Vekaria of Head Projects Group who along with cousins, Darpan Patel and Ritesh Hirani, ran a 10k obstacle course in The Warrior Adrenaline Race in aid of Wells for India. They raised an impressive £425 thanks to family, friends and work colleagues.

Lemon+Aid

Maya Grenia had the great idea to sell water and other drinks from her ‘Lemon+Aid’ stand to raise awareness of girls in India who miss school while fetching water. Raising a tremendous $1000, Maya’s donation will cover the costs of two water capture tankas so girls from two families can stop fetching water and go to school. Thanks Maya!

Water Harvest Supper

Successfully nominated by Alan Frostick, Crosscrake’s church in Kendal, Cumbria, hosted a Christian harvest supper, which resulted in a brilliant £1,120 donation to Wells for India including £100 from the local Girl Guides. Held at the nearby Punchbowl Inn pub in Barrows Green, the food was great and so was the company.

Selfie for Santa

The University of Northampton’s geography students were busy raising awareness and funds for Wells for India in the run up to Christmas last year, which resulted in a lovely £136 donation. They hosted a Christmas Fair with home-made Christmas cards, a ‘Selfie with Santa’ photo opportunity and a ‘pin the nose on Rudolph’ game.
Om Prakash Explains…

NAADI

Man-made village ponds for the whole community to use, naadis are a traditional way of keeping water locally in dryland areas – most Rajasthani villages have 4–5. They collect rainwater from adjoining natural catchments but are prone to silting and contamination. Covered water taankas preserve water longer and are more hygienic.

How did you come across Wells for India?
“Mark Everard (Wells for India Ambassador) is one of my lecturers. He hosted a talk by Om Prakash Sharma, and I decided to get involved.”

What inspired you to fundraise for Wells for India?
“I was in India last year and the inequality and distribution of wealth was quite striking. I was really motivated by the success of Wells for India’s work and the passion of everyone involved. It’s also a great opportunity for me to challenge myself!”

Right as Rain

Though a shadow of their former glory from deforestation and over-mining, the Rajasthani foothills of the Aravalli Range of mountains are an impressive backdrop to the development organisation, Tarun Bharat Sangh (TBS). Meaning ‘Young Indians Association’, TBS was founded more than 40 years ago by students and professors from the University of Rajasthan, Jaipur, to promote rural education.

By the mid-80s, Rajendra Singh was Chairman (see his profile on page 9), and having moved TBS to the harsh and semi-arid lands of the Alwar District supporting two tribal groups (Meenas on the plains and Gujjars in the hills), its priorities soon shifted to water when they saw the desperate need.

With wildly fluctuating seasonal temperatures (India’s highest at 50.6°C / 123.1°F until 2016), dried rivers and no groundwater for decades, both humans and the vast biodiversity of wildlife, including the tigers, were perishing. However, when Rajendra Singh and hundreds of volunteers began reviving traditional water harvesting methods to capture and store the sporadic rains to recharge groundwater, rivers and ponds, life began to flourish.

FACT FILE

1,000 villages and 1 million people have benefitted from TBS’ work.

It wasn’t until 2014 that Rajendra Singh’s good friend, Om Prakash Sharma, Wells for India’s Director, agreed to an ambitious new project partnership co-funded by the local community in the Sarsa river catchment.

Alongside building ‘Johads’ (check dams used to retain water and recharge groundwater, for which Rajendra Singh had become world-renowned), their ambition was to challenge centuries of tradition, introducing ways to use less water in agricultural production.

Almost 170 farmers co-invested in drip irrigation kits and sprinkler systems, whereby methods of using less water achieved significantly improved crops. The results were staggering – an 80% time saving and 50% water saving, increased income (they could charge a higher price for better quality crops) and faster harvests so additional crops of coriander and ladies’ finger (okra) could be planted. Increased fodder for cattle improved milk production so the famous Alwar milk dessert ‘Kalakand’ could once again be made.

Surrounding communities couldn’t believe how much the farmers had prospered and were soon asking to get involved. So TBS and Wells for India agreed to their second project, starting in late Spring 2017, which will see even more families benefit.

Now, with more water availability, smart ways to use it more sparingly, and the chance to build more sustainable livelihoods, families really are becoming right as rain.

MEET

RAJENDRA SINGH

Often called ‘The Water Man of India’ and winner of the Stockholm Water Prize (known as the Nobel Prize for water), Rajendra Singh is an inspiring force for good. Championing the water rights of rural communities with government and business, he was named by The Guardian newspaper in the ‘top 50 people who could save the planet’.

Born in Uttar Pradesh in 1959, a talk by the Gandhi Peace Foundation set Rajendra’s course to help rural communities. As Chairman of Tarun Bharat Sangha (TBS), in 1984, Rajendra sold all his worldly goods for ₹23,000, (around £240) and took a bus to the final stop – Alwar District, Rajasthan.

Rajendra delivered Ayurvedic medicine and education until a village elder said: “Water is a much bigger problem than education.

You need to work with your hands if you really want to help!”. Seeing that traditional water conservation techniques had been abandoned in favour of bore wells, Rajendra began reviving and building ‘Johads’, earthen dams that stored rainwater and recharged groundwater.

He has since built 375 dams in the Arvari river catchment bringing water for the first time in 60 years, won court-cases closing down 470 mines to stop water evaporating in pits, helped build over 8,600 johads capturing water in 1,000 villages and revived five rivers.
After 30 years, Wells for India has supported 1,600 villages and 1.6m people, providing 1.3bn litres of water.

Drought devastates rural villages in Rajasthan once again, lasting four more years. Wells for India responds with emergency supplies of water, food supplements and fodder for cattle.
2001 – Image 7, 8
Om Prakash Sharma, a water engineer, joins Wells for India to lead projects in India. He recognises that providing the ability to capture rainwater, rather than fixing wells to tap parched groundwater sources, is more sustainable and focuses on water harvesting.

Wells for India creates women’s self-help groups where learning to manage money and save together builds confidence and a future for their families. Following more severe droughts, Wells for India provides emergency relief to 120 villages.

2014 – Image 11
India Prime Minister, Narendra Modi, launches the Swachh Bharat Abhiyan (Clean India Campaign), aiming to install 120m toilets by 2019. Wells for India works with the government on sanitation projects.

2015 – Image 12
Nicholas and Mary are made Honorary co-Presidents. Wells for India introduces ways of reducing water usage through drip irrigation in farming, and develops new opportunities to sell crops.

2017 – Image 13
Today, Wells for India’s current projects place a great importance on building communities’ governance skills to make decisions cooperatively across caste and religion, and lobby for government funds. So much work has been achieved and yet there’s so much more to do!
A Meeting of Minds at the University of West England (UWE)

In a changing world, Wells for India believes in sharing and collaborating with like-minded organisations to innovate for new ways to alleviate water poverty. As such, it was a pleasure for Wells for India to present to Environmental Management students at UWE, supported by their Associate Professor and Wells for India’s new Ambassador, Dr Mark Everard, who said: “What Wells for India is doing is one of those precious jewels scattered across the face of the Earth from which wider society needs to learn, before the roots of the tree are totally debilitated.”

Sharing Successes at Voices from the Desert, October 2016

Friends and supporters alike enjoyed a very informative presentation from Om Prakash Sharma, Wells for India’s India Director, sharing the successes of the past year and exciting plans for the future. A big thank you to our friends at the Gandhi Restaurant in Winchester for providing a wonderful Indian supper afterwards.

Inspiring Young Leaders Committed to Positive Change at PeaceJam 2017

Wells for India was delighted to host a workshop for a lively group of 14–18 year olds called ‘Water, Women and Sanitation’ in March this year. Activities included looking at why rural communities in Rajasthan have water shortages and possible solutions, female participants carrying water on their heads, like the women in Rajasthan who fetch water, to think about what problems this causes, and what difference improved sanitation will make to the elderly, disabled and women in particular.

Font of Knowledge

In the harsh and unrelenting Thar Desert, many tribal communities are nomadic, walking for miles in search of water and food. This way of life is particularly hard on the elders who keep the wisdom of the community. That’s why we have pledged to provide 300 monsoon water capture taankas, supporting 300 families with elderly relatives. Each taanka costs £350, but will benefit generations.

Can you help us to fill the font of knowledge? Just £10 will buy 42 bricks towards building a taanka. Go to: www.wellsforindia.org/donate or send a cheque to the address listed on the back page. Thank you.

Every Drop Counts

Many of our 50 farming families in the Aravalli mountain range have been trained and are now using drip irrigation systems, thanks to the Every Drop Counts appeal. Using 50% less water, they are growing stronger and more abundant crops such as mustard seeds and coriander, which they are selling at better prices in new markets.

Our funds fall short of helping just three remaining families – can you help us reach the remaining £1,500? If you have already supported this appeal, thank you – your donation is creating sustainable, lasting livelihoods.

Font of Knowledge Appeal

Seeking Support

With your help, we’ve reached our target to support 50 girls with all their water and sanitation needs across 50 villages in Rajasthan. Previously trapped in a cycle of drudgery and ignorance having to fetch water all day, every day, your gift has freed these girls and given them a chance of a brighter smarter future. So on behalf of them all, a heartfelt thank you.

As a Trustee of Wells for India, I wanted to see the positive impact of our work in empowering women and share this with my daughter, Jen, a talented astrophysicist. So earlier this year, we visited some projects.

In Sohanpura, Jaisalmer, we met Peppo Devi and her family who are proud owners of a taanka. Previously, she and her daughters would walk 10–15 kms a day to collect water. Of their average annual income of Rs 25,000 (less than £300), around a quarter would be spent on water. The family now saves Rs 1000 a month – Peppo Devi has bought 20 goats, three cows and she is saving for a camel! Her two sons, but also her four daughters, now attend school. This one taanka has had a huge impact on the quality of all of their lives.

At an all-women self help group in Jaisamand, we met women who’d learnt to manage the family finances (something men had always done), taking charge of their lives and modelling excellent behavioural change.

Seeing how different their lives were to Jen’s and mine humbled and enthused me to do all that I can to ensure women like Peppo Devi not only have access to water but are also supported to live empowered lives too.

Jen and I will cherish the memories of the women we met, and the endless cups of ‘chai’!
